TRAGIC ROMANCE OF THE VILLE

[From the New York Graphic]
A large, wooden, building, dilapidated and weather-beaten, and yet suggesting in its architecture something of old time elegance and comfort, stands on Fifth avenue near Seventy-sixth street. It faces the park, and from its size and evident ago, attracts the notice of every passer-by. It is fronted by a portico, from the roof of which, looking a little to the north of west, one can easily see a clump of cedars occupying high ground to the north of west, one can easily see a clump of cedars occupying high ground in almost the center of Central Park, The cedars are of long growth, and twenty years ago their branches cast their shadows against the structure of which we are speaking. The house was formerly the residence of one of our oldest and most aristocratic families. When the construction of the park was determined on, the ground was purchased by the city, and the house was removed to the location it now occupies, the family changing their residence for a more pretentious and modern one farther down. casing and modern one farther down. Before the date of their removal, how-ever, a daughter was born in the old homestead, who, as years passed away, grew up beautiful and accomplished. Her parents were devoted to her, and she enjoyed the culture and luxury which their ample means commanded. She received a fine education, and arriving at the culture whood a few years since she entered to the control of the culture who are the culture of the culture who are successful to the culture of the DR. when she until a young man of Southern parentage, an employe in a down-town house. His character and connections are said to be irrepronchable, and he is stated to be worthy of the highest esteem in every way. The heiress made a deep impression on him, and he began to pay his suit to her. With a discertment that confirms the good sense and discretion worthiness of her suitor and encouraged his attentions. The young man proceeded, from the outset, in a manly honorable manner, and as soon as he say that an equal attachment was the reward of his own, he sought an interview with the father of the young lady, and asked his permission to make a proposal of

The father received him courtously, but told him that although he respected him, and knew him to be of unteously, but told him that although he respected/him, and knew him to be of unimpeachable character, and associations, there was a serious, and to him unsurmountable obstacle to a union. "You are a poor young mao," said he, "and have your way to make in the world. I have always intended that my daughter shall marry a man whose fortune equals that which shall be hers. For this reason, which is with me one of grave importance, I hope that there will be no more of this. I esteem you, and believe you to be a gentleman of honor, and I trust you will have a regard for my feelings in this matter. The young man replied that he should never enter any tamily an unwelcome member. He loved the young lady, and, loving her, would have endeavored to make her happy, provided he could have obtained the free consent of her parents to a marriage. But as this could not be he would cease his visits. He did so, and the young lady saw him no more. At first she wondered, then sorrowed, and finally a settled despondency took possession of her. Her parents, neither of whom had told her that her lover had asked her hand of them, sought vainly to arouse her from a state of mind which began to cause them, sought vainly to arouse her from a state of mind which began to cause them serious uneasiness. At length they planned a trip to Europe for her; and, although the senson of the year was not that in which pleasure journeys thither are usually undertaken, they made all haste to get her off. She herself was taste to get her ou. She herself was utterly indifferent, and saw the preparations for her departure hurried without manifesting any interest in them or the projected journey. Her friends, hearing of her intended departure, gathered to wish her a happy trip and a safe return. The absence of a vivacity and sprightliness natural to her was generally necess patural to

JOURNALISTIC REMINISCENCE.—We have been looking over a copy of the Panama Star, of February 24, 1849, presented to Messrs. Barry & Patten by Gen. George P. Ihrie. This newspaper measures thirteen inches by seventeen inches, and has been framed with double glass, to enable the reader to peruse the whole vast production. The motto is "Press Onward!" a very pertisent watchword for its readers, awaiting a passage to the Mesca of their golden hopes. The paper is Vol. 1, No. 1, and on its first page announces that it will be published weekly, by J. B. Bidleman & Co.; printed by S. K. Hendrie and J. F. Backman. It contains a proclamation, addressed to William Nelson, Esq., U. S. Consul, at Panama, by Gen. Fersifer F. Smith, Commander of the Pacific Division of the U. S. Army. There is a long list of names of passengers, awaiting the tardy and uncertain arrivals of the steamers to take them to San Francisco. In the list are many well-known citizens who have lived in California nearly a quarter of a century; men whose bright, hopeful, youthful faces we remember so well in Panama, in the days when John Perry had his broker's office in a big, mahogany, leather-seated chair, in the doorway of Sarlande & Ritchit's grocery store, where we swapped a three hundred and seventy-five dollar, first-cabin tickt on the Sarks Sands, for a deck passage on the propeller Columbus, even, and very glad of the bargain. In the days when Captain Wright, George and John Wright and Captain Conklin were awaiting the arrival of the steamer West Point, from New York, via Panama, for San Francisco; and the sound of a gun at night, or the sight of a thread of amoke at day, by the measure of the strake in the 1,900-toot level. And, one night, a lot of wags—some of whom are very seedate, gray-haired citizens of San Francisco to day day—detailed a JOURNALISTIC REMINISCENCE. - We have news of the strike in the 1,900-foot level. And, one night, a lot of wags—some of whom are very sedate, gray-haired citizens of San Francisco to-day-detailed a portion of their number to beguile the barefooted guard on the Battery, with cigars and cognac, while the balance loaded one of those long brase guns on the old rampart, and, appling a long fuse, walked steafthily away. Arriving tu town soon after, the booming discharge had sent the California Steamer Ticket Market to an elevation-very remunerative to the pockets of the amateur artillerists. In this paper is an announcement that
